In an attempt to deliver a stirring, dramatic and historic speech, Sarah Palin instead resorted to a speech filled with unfair attacks, sarcasm and inaccurate references to herself and promising changes that were both disingenuous and not plausible. Check out this article from her hometown newspaper <http://www.adn.com/sarah-palin/story/515517.html>

What Palin failed to mention is anything about many of her extreme positions on abortion rights, global climate change, equal pay for women and gun control issues. She gave the impression that she is against government waste and fights for her citizens as a reformer, but her limited experience as mayor and then governor of Alaska shows us just the opposite.

But a recent list of books that she wanted banned from the Wasilla Public Library truly demonstrates that Palin not only has no new ideas, but is really a throwback to days of old when we needed to always be full of fear, to go back to days when we had a less than equal world and where anyone who does not look like Sarah Palin must fight every day for the same rights and privileges that she and her family have come to take for granted.

This is the list that comes from the records of the Wasilla library. Most of these books are not a surprise, but some of them do raise some questions as to whether she wants citizens to be left completely uninformed and uninspired.

Here's the list and a little preamble that goes along with the list from the person who provided this list of proposed banned books:

More things to learn about Sarah Palin> >For those of you who think that all of the opposition to Sarah Palin is >from "leftwing" nuts; the following is a list of books that she tried to >get banned when she was mayor of Wasilla. I am not sure that Mark Twain, >William Shakespeare, Maya Angelou and Geoffrey Chaucer would be considered >dangerous to children. Judy Blume give me a break. Harry Potter, who is >kidding who. I also fail to see how Webster's Ninth New Collegiate >Dictionary by the Merriam-Webster Editorial Staff should be banned.> >This information is taken from the official minutes of the Wasilla Library >Board. When the librarian refused Palin tried to get her fired as she did >with the Safety Director of the State who refused to fire a trooper who was >getting a vicious divorce from her sister> >She also told her Assembly of God Church in June 2008 that it is "God's >Will" that the federal government contribute to the expansion of the Alaska >pipeline. (M ust have been talking to George Bush). She sounds like one of >those lawyers Bush put into the justice department.> >This is the list of books Palin tried to have banned. I am a librarian and unfortunately I have to warn against releasing this list. It seems that it is not accurate and came from an unreliable web source. However, it is true that Palin tried to harass the town librarian and threatened to fire her if she did not remove books which the Pit Bull found offensive.

Thank you for the admonition. I have no way to vet this information. But it should be taken into consideration for whatever value it has. I worked in a library for four years myself in my earlier life and become concerned if any person and particularly an elected official moves to get even one book banned.
